As fireworks lightened up the skies around the world, the New Year began with a tint of optimism for relations between South and North Korea, as the two resumed dialogue leading to the Winter Olympics. However, few have noticed that meanwhile it was China that is quietly changing the status quo of the regional peace and security.

On 4 January 2018, the Chinese government unilaterally launched the northbound M503 flight route and three extension routes in the Taiwan Strait. The decision of mainland China to unilaterally activate new flight routes is not only a violation of a reached agreement between both sides in March 2015, but also endangers cross-strait and regional security. Taipei urges China for dialogue on the aviation safety related issues.

How to preserve the hard-won peaceful and stable cross-strait relations? Why should the international community raise its concerns over the irresponsible actions by Beijing? Professor Lin will share his views with the participants.
